On The Street Where You Live: Growing up in the 1950s Tony Redding

Enter the world of the 1950s child. From the corner sweet shop to the playground, to boys pretending to be Spitfires and the delights of frozen Jubblies. Tony Redding brings back a flood of memories as he takes us back to 1950s London. This book will appeal to all who remember the fifties, especially those from the south east of London. Why was growing up in the 1950s so different and special? If you are in your early sixties you will know the answers. If you remember cream soda, wagon wheels, snake belts, Rin Tin Tin, Robin Hood and Popeye, this book is for you. If you were born long after 1960, here is the world of your parents or grandparents, set out in all its 1950s glory: "six of chips", Eddie Cochran, The Shadows, smog, bomb sites, a caning at school, Penny for the guy and British Bulldog. Turn the pages and shift into a time when you could press 'button B' and get your money back, whiten your teeth with Pepsodent and listen to adults criticising the Police for failing to lock up enough Teddy Boys. Enjoy! About the author Tony Redding is a journalist and international specialist in the media aspects of emergency response. He is the author of two books on WWII, together with a book on marine salvage. He has lectured extensively on WWII and is also an enthusiastic amateur archaeologist. He is married and lives near Canterbury in Kent.
