What a difference a year makes, and little did I know after my sincere, albeit somewhat one-sided conversation, with the master at the end of my first book, 'Paws For Thought', that there would be a second Zoe book after all.

The master and I were both quite determined at the time that enough was enough and not to flog a good thing and leave while the going is good and walk before you get kicked out and exit quietly with people wanting more and all those things we glibly say but do not really mean or understand why we say.

So what - or who - persuaded us to get back to the drawing board?

Very simple really. The folk we met on our walks and who kept asking if really, really there would not be a second book, and the black cats and squirrels and rabbits who were praying so hard for there not to be.

The master and I both agreed that we could not let the latter have the last word, so we dedicate this second instalment to those who so fervently wished that enough was enough.

All we can say is you have to pray harder next time.

Will this be a different kind of book to the first one?

Probably. It remains to be seen. I don't think the master knows either. He keeps saying that he hopes his three months Drammatical which is just about to start will provide him with some time to get writing. Or is it Sabbatical? I'm not quite sure.

He did hint to me the other day that he wants Book 2 to be more poetic. And I know where that comes from. He is still seething inwardly that I am getting in the way of him publishing his precious collection of poetry. Silly man!

If anything, I guess this time I shall have to realize that I will not have it all my own way and that he will be far more strict with the woof-reading!

My Mum is the Chaplain of the Morel Court Methodist Home in Penarth - so my Master and I have decided that all the income from our books should go to Morel Court.
